More Congressional Hearings That Weigh in on MK-Ultra Gate and the Transference Issue

It's certainly a watershed moment in human history. Either checks and balances in democracy that took almost a thousand years to evolve will be employed or one can expect that from now on there's going to be a devolution in civilization.

Sixty-years ago that day there were fierce battles on the beaches of Normandy - and all in the name of democracy. And a legitimate question can be asked of some of that blood spilt was in vain when considering the devolution of that paradigm of governance in the early 21st century. Was so little learned during that tumultuous period of time? It was an experience of very interesting proportions to see Fed Chair Bernanke and Attorney General Holder giving testimony and Speaker Boehner and his immediate predecessor House Minority Leader Pelosi one-after-the-other give press briefings.

The Attorney General was appearing before the House Judiciary Oversight Committee and got a grilling that reminded him of the need for his office to conclude the transference issue. First up Senator Conyers, who drew to his attention that which has the top law officer in the country must do to get this off Congress' plate.

Holder: But it is something we continue to look at and in which I have been personally involved over the last two to three weeks.

Conyers: [35:24: Branson M., Bernanke M.] And what was the goal of the so-called pro-filing guidance?

Let me squeeze in my last question. Can you talk a little bit about the charges of selective enforcement of immigration law? I don't know if you've heard of any [36:24: Sarkozy M.] of those kinds of complaints. Can you respond for that for me please?

Congressman Nadler put the AG's feet to the fire.

Nadler: Excuse me, will you commit to providing a copy of the briefing -- a copy of the legal memo from OLC?

Holder: We will certainly look at that request and try to determine...

Nadler: ...and a briefing to the members of this Committee?

Holder: And we'll certainly consider the possibility of a briefing.

Nadler: [44:14: O-S M.] A "possibility"? You won't commit to giving a briefing to this Committee?

Same went for Congressman Lungren, and high profiling the lies and deceptions that perpetuated and concealed the MK-Ultra program. He's of the same mind as partners that was discovered could not but shake the much needed confidence in a strong, credible system of government - what's supposed to be the model for the world.

Holder: All the, I think, empirical and neutral evidence shows that the questions of vote fraud do not exist to the extent that people say that it does exist.

Lungren: [1:18:16: Brown M.] So, the Supreme Court was wrong in its decision in 2007 when it said that States have a legitimate interest in requiring photo IDs for voters even [Erin M.] absent evidence of widespread fraud in order to inspire confidence [Aussie M.] in the electoral system. You disagree with the court on that?

AG Holder uses a geo-gesture in a way that appears to say he's going to use the powers of his office to deliver serious accountability. Problem is, partners have heard that before when giving testimony as documented.

Holder: He says that the Court acknowledged the undeniable fact that voter ID laws can burden some citizens' [1:19:04: R-S M.] right to vote. It is important for States to implement and administer such laws in a way...

Chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, Darrell Issa rips into the witness on the topic being discussed and uses the opportunity to express his frustration at the Holder hold up in concluding the transference issue.

Holder: We believe we have responded to the subpoenas...

Issa: ...No, Mr. Attorney General, you're not a good witness. A good witness [1:25:46: Bernanke M.] answers the questions asked.

A distinguished and learned former member of the U.S. court also tears a strip off the Attorney General. Having been on the Bench and thus sensitive to abdications of responsibility by constituents of the administration of justice, Congressman Gohmert delivered a stinging indictment of his failings in bringing an end to what's been so inexplicably and intolerably drawn out.

I've been a Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals. [...] I've had people come before me who were friends that I've sent to prison because that was consistent with justice of what I would have done in their situation who was not a friend. I have sentenced the children of friends with a courtroom full of my supporters who were all begging me not to. But I knew if I was going to be consistent in justice I had to do that. I've sent people to prison because it was the fair and just thing when considering all of the facts [2:19:11: Kernan M.] and considering what had been done in the past.

At exactly the same time the Chairman of the Federal Reserve, who's been in the back-channel before while testifying before Congress was appearing before its Joint Economic Committee. Congressman Brady's query led Dr. Bernanke to drop his eyes in reaction to use of the lexicon.

C. Brady: ... banks are in strong financial condition and being there to provide liquidity to solvent banks. [34:58: Z-J M.] Are those -- are there any other tools than that that you're considering should [Z- J. M.] that contagion reach us [Z-J M.]?

Bernanke: [eyes drop]

A bit later, feeling as if he's got some responsibility to resolving the outstanding transference issue, he reminds everyone that it'll take both sides of the congressional isle to bring closure. .

I am glad to see that there's a bi-partisan effort involved in trying to address this important problem [1:00:00: Cl.M.].

He doesn't understate, but rather puts accurately, the matter of what MK-Ultra Gate exposed to the world would mean. Cognizant of the inordinate delay in getting funds to the Canadian lawyer and with some members of Congress angry and the Fourth Estate breathing down the necks of everyone who's responsibility it is to conclude the transaction to stave off a historically catastrophic event, he stresses as best he can that this circumstance is of the highest priority.

The brinksmanship last summer over the debt limit had very significant adverse effects for financial markets and for our economy. For example, it really knocked down consumer confidence quite noticeably.

So that's a somewhat separate issue; but I urge Congress to come to an agreement on that well in advance so as not to push us to the 12th hour. But again, I think that trying to put our fiscal situation on a sustainable basis is perhaps one of the most important things that Congress can be working on [1:01:13: Cl.M.].

While both the Attorney General and Fed Chair are giving testimony, Speaker Boehner enters the electronic room. He lashes out at his political adversary in the following manner:

All we've heard from the White House is silence [1:38: Newman M.]. But that's the story of the Obama administration. [...] The President and Senate Democrats are more interested in gimmicks than they are in real solutions [2:03: Cl.M.]. You know there is no better example than...

A few minutes later House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi joins in. She's already felt Fourth Estate heat and knows that if this to date confidential situation blows up, she too will experience consequences. On May 20th she faced ABC news and experienced firsthand just how impatient American news media that were victims of White House, Pentagon and CIA impropriety are about the lingering issue of allocation transference. Standing in front of the Washington press core she insists the Democrats are going to 'prevent' this calamity.

[There's going to be] a heavy emphasis [7:38: O-S M.] on prevention and wellness [audience: NBC M.] that'll also reduce cost. The public doesn't [O-S M.] generally know that - that ... [...] whether its [7:55: Erin M.] ending discrimination against children because of a pre-existing medical condition. Whether it was these wellness prevention - once a year - checkups [Erin M.] now people are -- especially our seniors are getting. Whether it's the lowering the cost [Erin M.] of prescription drugs for seniors by closing [Execution M.] the donut hole.

Five days later the Attorney General appears before Congress again and the pressure on his office to finish what was said to have been begun in February continued. First Senator Grassley highlights what is undeniable, namely that triggering a scandal that would dwarf Watergate is a looming constitutional crisis.

AG Holder: We want to make sure that if we do share that information it does not have an impact on on-going investigations. But, as I said, I'm willing to consider that as a possibility to try to avoid what I think is an impending constitutional crisis.

S. Grassley: [37:48: Bl.M.] Have the wiretap applications already been produced to the defendants in 'fast and furious'. And if so, why shouldn't Congress and the public get to see what the indicted gun smugglers get to see?

Senator Feinstein uses the lexicon to make it clear she wants his attention as much on what is being publicly discussed as what's going on in the back-channel.

Let me talk to you about something. [1:05:21: Branson M.] Senator Grassley and I had something called the Senate Caucus for International Drug Control. And it's been very interesting because in the course...

Either seeking to disingenuously placate the panel or genuinely describing steps being taken, the Attorney General offers news that he's in talks with his coalition counterparts, presumably passing around the hat to collect from those governments that were co-colluding with the Bush and Obama administrations. If this was a ploy to answer the question why haven't the funds been delivered, he failed; because the civil liability is joint and several.

Technically it matters not what other malfeasant countries are involved. The U.S. is on the hook for all of it and the costs of delay shouldn't be borne by the Canadian or the rest of the coalition that want to move from being seen as geo-impotent to a force to be reckoned with. Further, his office can work over the medium term to obtain compensating amounts from those involved.

I've been in the Caribbean. I've [1:07:31: Brook M.] talked to my counterparts in [Erin M.] Central America...

He then makes it sound like he's on the case.

I've also indicated earlier in my testimony [1:37:29: Erin M.] to the extent that all of that is [R-S M.] not enough to satisfy the concerns that have been raised in the House Committee. I am willing to sit down and talk about [Erin M.] the provision of more materials. I have sent letters in that regard [Erin M.]. The Deputy Attorney General has sent letters in that regard.

Senator Leahy, who's been geo-vocal in the past (1, 2), puts on the record just how concerned he is and how before he insists that those involved be held to account and face serious consequences.

If my friend from Utah decides -- is willing to agree to an up or down vote [to dispense with recess appointments] I'd be happy to pick up the phone and urge the President to re-nominate them. [...] On this one [2:14:20: R-S M.] -- on the particular one that is of concern and I must say right again parenthetically I appreciate and admire the Senator's concern he's expressed it; he's stated it very clearly.

Senator Klobuchar acknowledges she's aware of Congress' allocation:

The Senate has only approved $35 million. And when the bill gets to the floor I think we should get a match [2:16:54: Cl.M.] between the House and the Senate on that appropriation.

The new member of the Senate, Al Franken, jokes about how some cable channels charge a lot and don't give good value for money. The Attorney General hears something he said that relates to the term of settlement regarding confidentiality and first reacts subconsciously - licking his lips and grimacing - and then red flags it with a geo-gesture.

Franken: Cable bills are out of control in this country, as you know. Consumers want to be able to cut the cord and watch television shows and movies online rather than paying over $100 a month to their cable company to get channels they never watch - they don't want to watch and don't need...

Holder: Mr. Chairman I would be one of those consumers.

Franken: And we don't need to name those channels.

Holder: [grimace, licks lips and @ 2:33:12: Cl.M.]

As this documentation's title argues, the failure to address the shocking abuses of power, and especially in American politics, the military and intelligence communities, creates a "new normal". It could well spell the beginning of a slippery slope to a devolving civilization. The early 19th century German political philosopher G.W.F. Hegel saw humanity as having been on a multi-millennial trajectory to more perfect - more enlightened and ethical - forms of societal union and political organization. One doesn't have to be an iconic thinker to realize how true this is. We emerged from forests and caves and behaved like animals - engaging in bloody wars and religious exterminations through to medieval times. And we've just gotten over two world wars where the Holocaust set a new benchmark for cruelty. The result of these thousands of years is having been elevated to what we call 'modernity'; its indicia are the dignity of the individual being sacrosanct as is governance by the rule of law. When the most powerful and advanced nation in the world and history begins to degrade and other governments take notice and which will inevitably follow suit, some of what was gained and admired is lost and everyone is worse off because of it.

Then there's the issue of transferring our belief systems to the next generation. As the Fiefdom treatise argues, successive generations of Canada's elite looked retrospectively at what parents, grandparents and great grandparents got away with and pushed the envelope of criminality and corruption to new depths. Enslavement to horrendous military experimentation and non-stop torture using one's body and mind as weapons measured in decades. Forced deprivation of all kinds. Confessing to joyfully engaging in a crime against humanity. Embracing Satanism to justify this behavior and all the rest. All that behavior was at minimum condoned by two U.S. administrations at the highest levels. Should what's gone on north and south of the 49th Parallel go unchecked then it doesn't bode well for modernity going forward.
